FROM LITHEND TO THE GEY staSr SIRS. Sunday, July 23rd. In camp in the home-mead at VOLLr. E had given out that we wanted to buy horses yesterday, so this morning about breakfast time there was quite a horse-fair in our camp: we bought about half-a-dozen, making up our full number of thirty with one over, a little mare Evans fancied, and speculated in privately. J6n came in to say good-bye, bringing me a book that Magnusson had noticed at his room, an 18th century Icelandic poet, rather rare I believe. We all thought Jon a very good fellow and were quite sorry to part with him. So to saddle and off, on a grey cold overcast day threatening rain; Faulkner in poor spirits and obviously not very well. We ride west along the sides of the Lithe, and after an hour s ride are delayed by Evans mare finding herself near the stead she was bred at, and running off at score accordingly: so we sit down on a little mound, and watch Eyvindr chasing her all up the slopes, till at last he catches her and brings her back, rather in an ill temper; so she is tied to the tail of a stolid old pack-horse to check her exuberance, and on we go again. We make for BreiaSb61staSr, a church and priest-stead1 which we had seen on the Lithe-side from the plain on Friday; we are to...
